July 2006

London is currently experiencing a massive increase in bed bug infestations with an estimated 300% increase year on year. If identified quickly they can be eradicated and may only be a problem for a few days, if left to “take hold” the problem can persist for significant lengths and be extremely costly to resolve.

They spread via exposure and can become a problem in all sorts of residences regardless of hygiene and living conditions, they spread through contact and can be carried in luggage or on clothing. Increasingly they are being picked up by travelling both within the UK and abroad.

Common signs of bed bugs are illustrated below:

Blood spots left by bed bugs close to the areas that they rest and digest their food. The extent of the blood spots is a good indication of the duration of the infestation.

A trained treatment technician or member of staff will know what areas to search given the type of furniture that is present and the location of the bites.

Close up of male and female adult bed bugs, well fed specimens tend to have a larger area of dark brown in the abdomen.

Infestations can result from a single adult female which has the ability to lay up to 150 eggs per day.
