

AFAR

Where to Find Serenity in Bustling Hong Kong

By Devorah Lev-Tov

Photo by Yiucheung/Shutterstock

The Upper House

A hotel might not be the most obvious place to find peace and quiet, but in Hong Kong's sea of skyscrapers this one is worth seeking out. Located on the upper floors of a tall building in the heart of Central and designed by Andre Fu, the Upper House is a lesson in minimalism, with lots of straight lines, soothing wood, and tasteful art. If you can splurge on a room, you'll immediately feel at home in the massive studios that have some of the largest bathrooms in the city—a perfect haven. We were told upon checking in, "If you haven't taken a bath in your room, then you haven't really stayed at the Upper House." Seeing the massive, deep soaking tub with a stunning backdrop of the skyline, it all makes sense. If you're not spending the night, it's still worth heading up to the 49th floor for breakfast or afternoon tea at Café Gray Deluxe.